FEBRUARY 2019

While TCU's campus is stunning, it lacks the natural resources that schools in mountainous or coastal regions might have. Californians are not relocating to Texas for the scenery, pretty as it might be. What Texas does have is boundless career opportunity compared to many other regions.

TCU is redefining the VALUE OF A DEGREE for the next generation of leaders. It just needs to show us how it does it.

Another thing that is missing from TCU's message is anything resembling an empathetic, serious discussion about cost and affordability. TCU's average student debt is estimated at more than $36,000, making it one of the highest in the Metroplex and giving rise to the reality that many TCU students are not as wealthy as the stereotype might suggest.

By comparison, the average debt load at SMU was just over $29,000. Even more prestigious schools that recruit wealthier students are putting this discussion front-and-center. It's not a university-specific discussion, it's a nationwide one.

How can the No. 1 issue on virtually every student and parent's mind — even the wealthy ones — be so absent from TCU's messages? We want to continue expanding the message into these areas. If the brand is too rigid to fit these, it must be better defined.

Our interviews tell us financial aid and admissions leadership are already working on this problem. We look forward to seeing this as a central part of TCU's message.

Tone

We didn't see anything of note about TCU's tone, which seemed appropriate and well-timed. We'd love to see some more listening and more empathy in the brand's tone overall, but feel that we've covered these above.

Visual Design & Branding

TCU's design has some elements we love and some that left us scratching our heads, including placement errors and busy designs that try to say everything while saying absolutely nothing.

TOP 100 NATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Here are five things we've noticed right away:

1. "Holy Busy, Batman!" — Less is more. What do four random photos do that one compelling photo could not? Photos need to breathe, especially pictures with people in them.
2. Sloppy design — A quarter-inch of space divides the two photos in the middle. Why? Faces are cut off, and the teacher is not making clear eye contact with the students. Photos are too closely cropped to provide any value to the message.
3. Message misalignment — We love the message, but what does it have to do with the photos? This seems like an outcomes message tacked onto a student engagement (?) design.
4. Dated — The gradients, drop shadows and outlined text have been out-of-vogue since design trends switched to a flat design in the early 2010s. TCU's design looks significantly behind the times as a time when visual design is exploding nationwide with vibrant colors and message-forward text.
5. Inconsistencies — While TCU has a strong brand presence with the logo and purple, the pieces still have some inconsistencies where the call-to-action styles vary from piece to piece. These should be visually prominent and the light teal color felt out of place for the brand. Consider some contrast. CTA's should be consistent through print and digital communications to provide a consistent experience for the audience.

Out-of-home advertising presents its own set of challenges, and perhaps none is more persistent than readability. Light-colored fonts are difficult — especially when shadows are used — to read. Many font sizes are small and may be difficult to

We're guessing those are instructors on the 2017 billboards. Instead of having a staged shot, why not create some interaction? This will reinforce brand messaging about a small classroom. We also think that photography is a little overused in billboards. Billboards are a message-driven medium. We'd love to see a stronger value proposition here. Tell me why I should care in eight words.

If you're planning to use people, use people that look like your demographic — bright, fresh-faced, young, attractive people that prospective students will project their own lives onto.

istent conversations on the website materials. In other words, if you say "or "enroll now," keep it consistent. Students should expect to find the psychology throughout their admissions. Also, there's no need for the phone number main website is sufficient. Not many students based on a billboard.
